Complexity of discovery of protein-protein interactions in cell signaling. Tackling the challenge of understanding how a large number of protein-protein interactions (PPIs) function in cells is often an extremely complicated task. Many PPIs are transient and are not linked to phenotypic changes (e.g. cell growth or differentiation). Furthermore, the "how" is often intertwined with the "what" (proteome changes). Here we describe how we have used chemical genetics, including structural biology and systems biology, to study the PPIs involved in the ErbB receptor signaling network that controls cell growth, differentiation and maintenance. We also describe the strategy we have developed to track down the role of PPIs in a large number of cellular processes. PROJECT SUMMARY Long QT syndrome (LQTS) is an inherited arrhythmic disorder that increases the risk of sudden cardiac death (SCD) in afflicted individuals. Among LQTS subtypes, Timothy syndrome (TS) is the rarest and most lethal one. In our recent studies on human patients, we identified a novel non-coding regulatory element (NRE) in the TS gene LQT2, termed LQT2-NRE (also known as LQT2-CE). The NRE belongs to the class of lncRNAs and has a highly conserved evolutionary characteristic. Moreover, the LQT2-NRE is sufficient to trigger arrhythmogenic response when targeted to the heart. However, the mechanism underlying the NRE-induced arrhythmogenicity
