The iPad Pro improves Photoshop's features, usability and overall, with the overall improvements following an iPad-like flow that makes a lot of sense for anyone who uses Photoshop on any other platform. Lightroom feels like it will soon make possible more picture editing work on the go, as will Photoshop. And iPad Pro definitely makes the RGB Live filters and layers' dialogs easier to use. I am naturally biased though, in that I really do enjoy the iPad Pro. Once you start using the iPad Pro in Photoshop, you can see why it is so wonderful. Though the iPad Pro is first and foremost a drawing tool, it gives us a way to make adjustments reliably and accurately without any distractions. The added intelligence from the pen's pressure and by making selections with just a finger is a truly amazing experience, and something I don't have to miss when I move to work on the iPad Pro. But I think what the iPad Pro does is really amazing. Being able to tell Photoshop to do whatever we want with a few taps on the screen is a very satisfying experience, regardless of which software we are using. Photoshop has a long and complex history, and the new iPad Pro gives us something that will fit seamlessly into our workflow for the foreseeable future. However, the iPad Pro's productivity is only part of the story, for me at least. As an artist, I have my own set of design and production standards to help shape how I plan and work with my projects. I love Photoshop in particular, so I nearly always use it. But I like to use other apps where I can. The iPad Pro should not replace the need for flexibility, but make our workflow much more streamlined and enjoyable.

Only, when the job is complete, users reclaim all their newly opened, discarded layers, and are left stuck with lots of unused graphics, which can look a little messy.

I can remember months before, asking my marraige candidate if she would like to spend her life in a home of her own."It's a mansion," she replied eagerly.
