by Gizmodo show that a group of biotech firms engaged in a lawsuit against California over the way the legislature had passed landmark GMO labeling legislation are now backing off and lobbying for a weaker proposal The president of the American Council on Science and Health (ACSH) signed a letter sent to the House Agriculture Committee's chairman who is working on the Dietary Labeling and Education Act of 2015 which would allow the USDA to write labeling rules for food and beverages. The letter is signed by 36 other individuals and organizations that were involved in the repeal of California's labeling bill. It was shared by Rep. Mike Conaway, who also chairs the committee. In the letter, the ACSH said that "there are very few health risks and benefits associated with genetically engineered foods," and thus the new proposed legislation "as written could be misinterpreted to imply a difference between genetically engineered and non-genetically engineered foods." The ACSH also argued that labeling all foods would cost billions of dollars and would require many companies to incur significant costs. Groups like the American Soybean Association, the National Corn Growers Association, the National Cattlemen's Beef Association, and the American Meat Institute have backed new legislation written by Rep. Steve King that would prohibit health claims and require labels to be extremely specific, allowing the USDA to write rules in this regard.
The ACSH letter claims that there is no evidence
