The process of decellularization involves the removal of cellular components including extracellular matrix. This study analyzed the decellularization process of the tunica albuginea of rabbit testis by means of microwave irradiation. Histological and ultrastructural analyses were performed to evaluate the integrity of the testicular tunica albuginea. Vimentin was used to confirm the removal of cellular component during the decellularization process. The appearance of the tunica albuginea sections treated with decellularization buffer was evaluated by transmission electron microscopy. The effect of decellularization on the measurement of testicular DNA content was analyzed. The decellularization resulted in the absence of cell nuclei and was confirmed by H&E staining and vimentin immunostaining. Immunohistochemistry analysis showed the complete removal of cellular components. Regarding nuclear protein content, we found a significant decrease in Sertoli cell nuclear protein concentrations (36.2%; P 0.05). The decellularization process not only removes the cellular components but it also affected the protein content of Sertoli cells. Further studies are needed in order to investigate the effect of this decellularization process on the development of the testis.
